$1 The daily press is an institution in the Anglo-Saxon world. The Sun is the most widely read British tabloid. Daily papers are more popular than weekly magazines.

In the US the freedom of the press is guaranteed by the First Amendment of the Constitution.

Television has of course taken an important part in the media. Is the Internet now going to be the overwhelming means of information ? Yet the Internet might not be as reliable as the traditional media. True, information is only a click of the mouse away, but it may amount to gossip and rumours. For instance, the online encyclopaedia Wikipedia is written by the users themselves; interestingly enough it has been estimated rather reliable by a recent study.

A piece of news can be devastating to careers or policies and needs to be carefully checked before the paper decides to break the news or uncover a scandal. Or else the newspaper can be sued for libel.

Ever since the tragic death of the Princess Diana, the popular press and the paparazzi have been accused of harassing and harming celebrities.

$2 Broadsheets (quality papers) provide reliable information and have been famous for being a counter-power to governments. In the U.S., The Washington Post launched the Watergate scandal thanks to a tradition of investigative journalism (1972). Journalistic independence allowed the reporters to expose the truth. Such a historical event led to calling
